(2/10)

Bureaucracy in Pakistan is one of the revered institutions of a country which is characterized by power and prestige.

This appeal of authority in the institution seems to have a great appeal for high proportion of youth in the country. Pakistan is a country which has largely remained disadvantaged due to geography, mercantile relations with non-state actors, identity crises, and political instability exhausting economic opportunities for youth of Pakistan. Pakistani youth is deprived of employment opportunities in technical fields such as medicine, engineering and information technology; therefore, they opt for going towards bureaucratic institutions by preparing for civil service examinations.

Secondly, the bureaucratic structure ingrained in colonial setup exercise immense and explicit power over other state institutions and public. Youth from the underprivileged areas are particularly more interested to become the status quo and exercise power & their only track is civil services.

Thirdly, the life style of civil servants is one of the aspects grabbing most of the attention. The material aspect such as lifestyle, job conditions, employment security and a wealthy status are dream of Pakistani youth. Lastly, the Pakistani culture has modelled and labelled the bureaucratic institution as a symbol of prestige and security. Youth, in order to achieve societal recognition and collective praise (associated with other social benefits) seeks to enter into civil services. As a result, every year, thousands of aspirants show their enthusiasm for bureaucracy; however, very few enter the system. Hence, bureaucracy in Pakistan proves to be lucrative and worthy institution when it comes to the stable future of youth.
