How Weather Shapes Human Nature

Weather and its challenges play an important role in the nature and energy of humans. The cold weather, along with its insurmountable obstacles, numbs human energy due to despair. Conversely, the hot weather with no obstacles provides little motivation for exertion due to the availability of resources. However, the obstacles that could be overcome and the weather that is bearable provide more power and vitality to humans. Therefore, in the moderate cold, common in temperate zone of northern Europe, humans struggle to protect themselves and obtain food with the hope that these challenges will be overcome. Similarly, the distinct seasons in the tropical region impact human nature throughout the year. In hot weather, they are relaxed, while in cold weather, they become energetic. (123 words)
