Choosing an uncommon and less crowded destination for holiday became a daunting task for the author however he was delighted when John suggested a trip to Cherokee, Oklahoma. By flight, they reached Qualla Boundary — a heaven on earth. The display of historical arts and the shows performed painted a clear picture of Cherokee's past. While skimming through the pieces in souvenir shops, they were welcomed by George, a middle-aged man surprisingly fluent in English, who then invited them over for lunch. Trade was not the only means of income, informed George, and that during off seasons the city usually resorted to other means such as gaming. Lastly, the author and his friend ^{went} visited to the ^{much cherished} museum in which depicted Cherokee's history. After the trip, the author was looking forward to have another trip.
