

A Trip to Cherokee

The author had trouble finding an exotic place to travel. However, he decided to visit Cherokee, as recommended by John. They toured Cherokee's town of Qualla Boundary, which was beautifully enveloped by mountains. The town's display of its 18th century tribal culture gives visitors a glimpse of the country's history. They toured souvenir shops, where they met an English-speaking shopkeeper. He told them that the Cherokees rely on multiple sources of income for their subsistence. When the tourism season is not on its peak, they resort to other means of earning. Bingo Weekend, offering various games, is one such significant means. The writer pledges to visit another foreign land, after enjoying museum of Qualla Boundary as his final destination.

Q # 3. (Composition)

Answer 1:

Most of us fail in our efforts for self-improvement because the goals we set to achieve are too high. And the time proves to be too short for the completion of those goals. Hence, owing to the shortage of time our goals become unmanageable for us. This results in our failure to accomplish them.

Answer 2:

It is a basic mistake to announce our resolution to everybody because it makes us look silly if we fail to keep up with it. If we go back practicing our previous habits, then that would make us appear even more stupid.

Answer 3:

The writer did not carry out his resolution on New Year's Day because of the New Year's Eve. He spent it in a party that prolonged the whole night. Hence, making him unable to work on his resolution.

Q #7 (Translation)

Generally, people think that a country's law and the freedom of its people work against each other.

Apparently, this does not seem wrong. Every law puts some sort of restriction on the citizens. If there is a greater number of laws in the country, there will be more restrictions. Personal freedom is limited by these restrictions. On the contrary, if the number of laws is less, the liberty of its citizens is enhanced.
