1. A man without any task lacks purpose in life. In the absence of goal, he wanders directionlessly. Not only does this drain over useless wandering, but it weakens his willpower. Since life carries both success and failures, the failures fall heavy on him and make him miserable. It leads to an unfulfilled and invaluable life, compared to the man with a task.
2. A life with task is worthwhile, no matter if one has a disagreeable one at his disposal. Tasks provide purpose and direction to a person. The sense of usefulness and accomplishment prevents the waste of energy on uncontrollable factors. Subsequently, this adds value and longevity to one's life and makes one a grateful person.
3. A man with a task lives a better life than the one who does not have any. He tends to live happier as he does not indulge in sluggishness compared to his counterpart. Similarly, he enjoys a resourceful and valuable life because of being useful. It also adds up to his longevity and makes him a grateful person. On the contrary, a man without task lives a shorter and valueless life devoid of all the happiness the former person cherishes.
