

Consequences of Rural migration to cities

The serene environment and weather of rural life is transcendent. The calm routine and friendly nature makes villages worth living. Unfortunately, the lag in appropriate economic conditions lead to mass migration towards cities. People have to leave their happy places in search of better living conditions. The emotional rush they felt during migration turns into a headache for them as well as for the administration. The mass rural migration results in limited resources to make both ends meet. The insufficient space in cities lead to issue like poor sanitation, unemployment, more traffic and above all is polluted weather. All these issues behaves as termite and lead to diseases, brawling and increased crime rate. Individuals starts adopting deviant behaviour to go through their needs. Moreover, administrative burden rises and loopholes are created. Surmounting traffic and industrial activities pollutes the environment. Lahore is the main victim of rural migration, as it ranks on number 2 as the most polluted city of the world according to UN environmental agency. Resultantly, air borne and water borne diseases are spreading rapidly. Therefore, to overcome this multidirectional cause, government needs to provide equal opportunities to rural areas. It would also be the positive step in stabilizing the country's economic growth.
