

The author wanted to visit an exciting and exotic place. His friend, John, advised him to visit Cherokee, in the state of Oklahoma. They started off their journey by visiting a town named Qualla Boundary which was surrounded by huge mountains. The tribal crafts and life-styles of 18th Century depicted an image of Cherokee's past. Despite of language barrier, they reached souvenir shops. The shops were full of traditional stuff. They were welcomed by George, who later, invited them for a lunch. George informed them that Cherokee's are not entirely dependant on trade. During the off-season, the Cherokee's opt for other ways like Bingo-weekend, which generate sufficient income. Lastly they reached a museum where a wide range of arts and symbols of Cherokee's cosmology were displayed.
