

Sub heading: IMF requires institutional reforms which as imposition on national sovereignty.

The structure is not accurate

Body Paragraph:

The requirements for the institutional reforms by the International Monetary Fund (IMF) can sometimes be understood as an imposition on national sovereignty.

The IMF reforms require a country to make some significant changes in its economic policies, regulations and institutions. These reforms are considered as an imposition on national sovereignty because if a country wants loan from IMF then it has to give control to IMF for all its domestic policy-making decisions and country can't make independent decisions in line with national priorities. In terms of Pakistan, IMF often demands many reforms which include severe measures such as reducing subsidies, increasing gas and electricity bills and increase in taxes. These measures lead to public backlash and political unrest in the country. In the light of evidences it is undeniable that institutional reforms required by IMF are imposition on national sovereignty.
