Human nature acts differently in different climatic conditions.

The efforts and struggles vary with temperature of the regions.

In cold areas, the human mind and body is pushed more to perform daily activities to survive the cold. On the contrary, people living in relatively warmer areas, can live lives without engaging in difficult and dangerous activities. ~~the~~ minimum food and clothing is required to achieve sustenance and can be achieved without the extreme utilization of energy. Humans act according to the nature of obstacles faced. In the face of invincible challenges, all hope and energy gets lost. Where as in the absence of it, there is no need for energy utilization consumption. But when faced with challenges, that are achievable, effort and energy is required from one's end. The moderate cold acts as such a challenge and benefits and pushes the human nature, to do more.
