

- Globalization as a Slough of Despond -

Globalization is a two edged sword. It runs on the policy of 'might is right'. Those countries which ^{are} economically developed and have certain hegemony over world politics, gain uncountable gains. And, those which lag behind others in global arena, are severely crushed and made dependent over masters of world system. For instance, globalization favoured global north in a cordial way, while global south was left on the mercy of fate. Therefore, it would not be an exaggeration to say that globalization is a tool to maintain global status quo, which leads rich to get richer and poor to get poor. Moreover, if history of globalization is traced, it will be evident that it was initiated when the first man in the world started to communicate with an other man, leading others to follow the suit. This concept of globalization or global village is not ^{only} limited to market and economy. But, health, legal system, finance, production, communication and culture has brought many feathers in world's cap. Globalization can be termed as a snake in the grass, because it exploits poor, whether they are people or states. Through this, MNCs, TNCs, NGOs and INGOs use mass muscles and extract benefits out of this on a relatively cheap cost, and sells finished services on a profitable rate. Neither the worker is happy nor the, nor the consumer is tickled, and the only sector which is on cloud nine with increasing globalization is 'capitalist class'. Thus the more the globalization, the less the class, capital and state & equality.
