

Nuclearization: A threat to (Hina Ashraf) Peace - Précis:

The author talks about peace because of modern deadly nature of war. In the new nuclear age war is not a sensible approach. Today's weapons are ten times more dangerous than those used in the World War II. The devastating impacts of these lethal weapons on environment and future generations render war a senseless option. Huge spending on acquiring weapons is certainly not only for maintaining peace. Because one can acquire peace by the right use of words. They say that talking about peace and denuclearizing the world is not possible until the leaders of nuclear weapon states follow a more sensible approach. The author believes that to ensure peace there is a need of collective change as a nation. Every educated and responsible individual who is in favour of bringing peace, should self-analyze his attitude and think

What he can do to attain peace. Most of the people find it an uphill task. It concludes that man is incapable of controlling war. These problems are man made so he has to resolve them. By making a comprehensive strategy and adopting an optimistic approach one can achieve peace without much resistance.
