

Culture ; Inherent Component of Society

Culture is an important component of the society. It reflects the structure of society. Any change in the structure of society can modify the culture of that society. Thus, cultural problems cannot be studied without solving social problems, cultural and social issues of emergent nations were the results of their old social system. Their development was frozen at that time. Even after getting independence and technological advancement, they were culturally restricted to a small class or group. They were still engaged in the division of society into different groups and classes in the same groups. This was the fundamental social and cultural framework inherited by the newly independent countries from their former rulers.
