

Meaning and Purpose of (Women) Education

Introduction:

Napoleon Bonaparte in 18th century explained the importance of women education by saying that "Give me an educated woman / mother, I shall promise you the birth of a civilized, educated nation." In today's developed world no one can deny the importance of education, especially women education. Women and girls represents half of the world's population, and therefore, half of it's potential. This half population play a vital role in the development of any country. And this development can be achieved through education - No nation can be rise to the height of glory if these women are confined the four walls of houses as prisoners. Aristotle believed that the education is the creation of sound minds in sound bodies. It means that acquiring education is not only limited to a specific class or gender. Another personality expresses his views about education of women - "We need to educate our men and women equally because the housework is with them both." In the modern era, the countries all over the world, especially third world countries are ahead with many challenges. In order to combat all those, the participation of women in every sector of life need to be enhanced. This enhancement is only possible by providing the adequate and equal opportunities of acquiring equality education to all women. This investing in women education is not only a moral imperative but a strategic choice for developing society.

Has emphasized through his saying

One can not deny the importance of

Can be availed

4/10

Good expression
Keep working over it