

Ancient and Modern Philosophers on Art

Ancient, as well as modern, philosophers believed that art excites human emotions, and brings chaos and disharmony in their moral life. Plato believed that poetic imagination grows human emotions that otherwise should be disregarded. For Tolstoy, infection comes from art. ~~and~~ The degree of ~~at this~~ infectiousness is a measure of its quality. This theory has obvious flaws. Tolstoy ignores the moment of form, which is fundamental to art. The state of mind when it comes to aesthetic experience is completely different from that of moral judgement. According to Wordsworth, poetry is emotion recollected in tranquillity. However, the tranquillity felt or the emotions excited ~~from poetry~~ by poetry are not the recollection. They are alive and immediate, and are seen rather than felt. Shakespeare explains the purpose of playing ~~as to be~~ holding ~~up~~ the mirror up to nature, so that it reflects its own passions. Looking through these passions does not mean that humans are infected with them. In this regard, Shakespeare's theory of dramatic art holds the similar view as that of fine arts.
