The writer talks about the moral implications of freedom in education with three contrasting views. One of the beliefs that children should be given liberty and should practice virtue. The writer considers it illogical and unapplicable on all children.

Similarly, another belief from the same school of thought i.e. education should not have an inherent positive goal, rather should be considered as a path for growth. The writer believes it to be undermining the significance of education (As the writer believes that) "It would be unrealistic and idealistic to expect uniformity and cohesion within a society without education and on mere human instinct. The writes believes that education <sup>has</sup> the ability to equip children with tools, techniques and morals that cannot be achieved

otherwise.
