How Authors Influence Personality Development

According to the writer, an author has influence on one's life similar to how food has an effect on the human body. One finds reading to be an agent of personality when they reflect on their history of individual literary education. Reading poetry at a young age does not necessarily mean that sensibility is keener at that age; rather, it is a sign that one's undeveloped personality is being shaped. This formation can also happen later in life.

However, if one is exclusively inclined towards a single author, it can lead to complete possession of one's life. On the other hand, engaging with multiple authors builds critical thinking and secures readers from developing a complete duplicate personality of an author. This fosters good critical thinking to manage personality development, preventing one from becoming a blind follower.
