

Houses are built to live in and not to look on.

Houses are indeed built to live in comfortably. Primary purpose of building houses is to provide humans a durable dwelling place. They are never meant to be entities of show-off and pomposity. Unfortunately, there is a huge bifurcation exists in our society when it comes houses. The poor is either homeless or lives in huts which are almost unliveable. Whereas the rich is living in palatial-type buildings. The rich spends colossal amount of money on decorating and embellishing their houses. If half or ^{even} less than this some of money is diverted towards improving the living standards of the downtrodden, life can become liveable for the poor.

Real purpose of houses is eclipsed by economic disparity prevailing in the world. The poor is unable to build houses which contain sufficient paraphernalia required by decent living. While the rich exceeds beyond the necessary criterion of house construction. In this context, if anything tangible that ^{can} be done is only possible through the state intervention. Welfare state ensures well-being of its every citizen. It protects the vulnerable and weak and constrains the strong and powerful from doing injustices with the weak. Proper wealth distribution is also one of the responsibilities of welfare state. It regulates the hoarding and accumulation of wealth.

in a few hands. Welfare state plays a benevolent role in ameliorating the poor condition of countrymen.

In 21st century, it has become a norm to build gigantic houses, maintain^{te} luxurious vehicles, keeping legion of servants and wasting money resources on useless activities. This trend has so much buy-in in the contemporary society that nowadays people even associate honour with this sort of living style. Greed and lust for adopting such lifestyle is on the rise. Society is becoming decadent and morally corrupt, because it holds wealth a primary goal of human life. Values, customs and traditions have relegated to the bottom of priority list. This is dealing a serious blow to humanity itself; hence, social welfare is only possible through reversing this trend.

To conclude, houses should be built to live in not to make them items on display. Despite spending a huge amount of wealth on decorating house, it would be better to divert this sum of money for facilitating the lives of the poor. It is naïve to believe that one's social status would upgrade if he or she has a luxurious abode to live in. Instead this ~~is~~ demonstrates one's self-centeredness. Therefore, houses should be just for living. Pride and privilege should ^{not} be associated with them.
