

Title:-

The typical vs genuinely unhappy man. '08'

The genuine unhappy man.

Précis:-

All psychological explanation of unhappiness have one thing in common; a typical unhappy man is usually deprived of a satisfaction in his youth and later on all his life (struggle) he does not feel happy because of it's deprivation. He becomes so frustrated that he only sees distraction and oblivion. Ultimately, he becomes devotee of pleasure. To make life bearable, he starts to escape life by drinking. The narcissist and megalomaniac believes in persuasion of happiness by corrupt means but in reality this means that they have already given up hope. Through out human history, there have been men who after observing the history of mankind come to believe that there is nothing to live for and to feel happy about. Such men are genuinely unhappy and they believe this to be a rational attitude necessary for an enlightened man. However, their pride over their unhappiness makes other people to believe that, the man who enjoys being miserable is not miserable at all.