

Human Development and Constant Miseries

Human history is filled with two types of miseries, which were inflicted by external nature and human beings themselves. External miseries were the worst. One had to escape wild animals and cold weather. Man used the biological gift of his body to escape wild animals and used their fur to survive in cold winters. In modern times, human bondage to external nature ^{e.g., famines} further diminished, through scientific advancements. It can be further reduced by using human wisdom. However, human-inflicted miseries e.g., wars, oppression of the vulnerable still persists on same level. There is a constant lust of power with a goal to spread conscious fear, that needs to be diminished.

Total words: 310

Precis words: 112