

Title:

The Importance of Teacher-Child Affection

The author says modern educationists wrongly emphasize the freedom of children, and give less importance to involving themselves with them. If teachers treat children unconditionally, they will easily comply with them. It is useless to expect too much from children. No child will be thankful for this kind of conditional treatment. The best interest always lies in cooperating with them. Teachers with this approach will win the trust of children without much effort. Unluckily, overburdened teachers can not have natural affection for children. One's purpose of life should not revolve only around education. To deal with children without strictness is vexing for teachers, this makes teachers frustrated, no matter what theory they follow. If teachers deal with children empathetically, natural fondness will develop in them. As nothing
