The reign of terror is a period during French Revolution in which thousands of people were murdered and imprisoned due to suspicion of being rebel to new government. Reign of terror started when the civil war erupted after the removal of French King. To handle the situation strict measures were taken by government of France at that time. Political opponents who were suspected of being loyal to king and against the new state were executed in large numbers. This is how reign of terror happened.

Author discusses three most important ways that made American revolution easier to complete than the French Revolution. Firstly, author argued that because America was beyond the reach of other world, other kingdoms and imperial states did not interfere in it. Secondly, Americans as a whole wanted freedom from the imperial UK.

Thirdly, American Revolution was easier because Americans only had to change the government and not the society. With these advantages, American revolution became a success.

I think all the above mentioned challenges played significant role but most important one in my view is the disunity of French people. The diversity in French society and the class difference which included peasants, middle class, the Nobles and the clergy were hard to unite at one platform. This led to civil war and then to reign of terror. Ultimately, it resulted in weak government too that was easily thrown away by Napoleon Bonapart.

The unity among American revolutionaries played a major part in their success. Americans were united against their common enemy, United Kingdom. They just had to simply change the government. Their society structure was all good. Therefore, American revolution was a success.
