Comprehension 47: GB CCE 2011

Read the following passage and answer the questions that follow.

Some protagonists of science claim that science along can introduce man to the secrets of this universe and life. And conclude that only that which is upheld by science is true; the rest is all trash. But while making such a statement they overlook the fact that science with all its brilliant and impressive record is still in its infancy and ever hesitant to commit itself as regards the veracity or otherwise of many things, for the simple reason that it cannot penetrate deep into the heart of reality beyond attempting a mere superfluous survey of it. Yet its votaries assert in the authoritative way that there is no such thing as human soul. They deny that man, confined as he is within the (v) limitations of his sensory organs, can ever have any contact with the Unknown - not even a glimpse of it through telepathy or dreams. They repudiate all these not because they have proved them to be mere illusions but simply because the *experimental science with its inadequate instruments has not yet been able to fathom their mystery. That they belong to a higher order of things not subject to man's observation was however sufficient to make these gentlemen turn their backs on them and pronounce their non-existence. Non-existence is one thing, non-susceptible to one instrument of investigation a very different matter. But they fail to see the difference between the two.
