

Inclusion of women in the economy is important specifically in third world countries

Women economic empowerment is essential for achieving women's rights and gender equality in third world countries. As 85.5 percentage point constitute world's developing countries. Also, women hold a significant number in world's population. Their inclusion in economy benefits them at national and international institutions. It is estimated that participation of women in world's economy can boost global wealth by USD 700 Trillion. For instance, the economy of the world declined in pandemic. In 2020, global GDP amounted to about 85.2 trillion US dollars, two and a half trillion lower than in 2019. It shows that lower labour and business ^{has} decreased world's economy. Therefore, more women empowerment in economy more the wealth of world will increase. Other than global economy, inclusion of women in economy diversify their participation from local to international level institutions. They can contribute to decision-making for themselves, for their children, and in governance. Women ^{are} likely seen spending money on their children for their better education and growth. In short, women in economic prosperity plays an important and crucial role specially in developing countries.