The world's problems are often caused by those who are constantly active but lack purpose and direction. Despite being busy, these individuals often fail to make a positive impact. The real issue is not laziness but the absence of thoughtful, deliberate action. Historical events, such as the period leading up to the World War I, demonstrated that if leaders had taken time to rest and reflect, they might have handled affairs more effectively. Presently, if politicians and religious leaders focused on genuine issues instead of merely condemning trivial matters, they would contribute more constructively. True progress requires not just activity but purposeful, reflective effort.
