

REVIS (2004)

Independent Character: A Building Bridge ^{for} Human Relationships

An individual tries to develop social interactions with personality techniques. This approach shortens the essential character base in the process. Moreover, personal victory is far more important than public victory. Self-discipline and self-control hone an individual's skills in developing good relationships. In addition, one ~~other~~ attains true self-respect through independence. Interdependence is also a choice which independent people can make. Undoubtedly, one cannot develop human skills without independence. If one's words are derived from mere human interaction instead of the inner core, others would easily detect the ~~double~~ ~~behaviour~~ duplicate behaviours. Therefore, before developing any human relationship skills, ^{an individual} one must develop a strong relation with oneself and the inner character. Hence, an independent character chooses to become interdependent on others. ~~or~~ ~~not~~.

Words: 120