In 2007, a reality TV show of immense popularity known as 'Keeping up with the Kardashians' was aired. The show seemed as a family culture narrative driven but soon showcased materialism, celebrity culture and distorted self-image. This reality show didn't just entertain it normalized getting surgeries and fillers, extravagant lifestyles and public altercations. The 14 years of this show blurred the lines of spectacle and reality, leading to young girls altering their features to look like them. It leads to the question whether such media glorifies immorality and influences real life behavior. Unfortunately, mass media with its connectivity leads to proliferation of immorality in society due to sensationalism, normalization of immoral behaviors, erosion of moral standards and psychological impacts on human minds. Unless these issues are addressed and resolved mass media will always fall prey to spreading of immorality
