Many people view the decline of civilization as inevitable, believing that a new age and civilization will emerge. However, this view is flawed. Humanity no longer has untapped potential to lead future spiritual growth; all societies today are interconnected, and their fates are linked. Civilization's revival depends not on collective movements but on the ethical transformation of individuals. This change must begin with a few who develop new ways of thinking eventually influencing the broader society. The spiritual and moral worth of individuals is crucial, and when the collective body dominates over individual influence, it leads to decay. Only individuals can initiate the spiritual-ethical ideas necessary for civilization's renewal. Without this repeated ethical awakening, society faces inevitable collapse. Thus, individuals must recognize their responsibility to contribute to the greater good through ethical leadership.
