I think modern educational theorists are inclined to attach too much importance to the negative virtue of not interfering with children and too little to the positive merit of enjoying their company. If you have the sort of liking for children that many people have for horses and dogs, they will be apt to respond to your suggestions, and to accept prohibitions, perhaps with some good humored grumbling, but without resentment. It is no use to have the sort of liking that exists in regarding them as a field for a valuable social endeavour, or what amounts to the same thing as an outlet for power impulses. No child will be grateful for an interest in him that springs from the thought that he will have a vote to
