

CSS 2004

We're dealing with a very dramatic and very fundamental paradigm shift here. You may try to lubricate your social interactions with personality techniques and skills but in the process you may truncate the vital character base. You can't have the fruits without the roots. It's the principle of sequencing: Private victory precedes public victory. Self-mastery and self-discipline are the foundation of good relationship with others. Some people say that you have to like yourself before you can like others. I think that idea has merit, but if you don't know yourself, if you don't control yourself, if you don't have mastery over yourself, it's very hard to like yourself, except in some short-term, psych-up, superficial way. Real self-respect comes from dominion over self, from true independence. Independence is an achievement. Inter-dependence is a choice only independent people can make. Unless we are willing to achieve real independence, it's foolish to try to develop human relation skills. We might try. We might even have some degree of success when the sun is shining. But when the difficult times come — and they will — we won't have the foundation to keep things together. The most important ingredient we put into any relationship is not what we say or what we do, but what we are. And if our words and our actions come from superficial human relation techniques (the Personality Ethic) rather than from our own inner core (the Character Ethic), others will sense that duplicity. We simply won't be able to create and sustain the foundation necessary for effective interdependence. The techniques and skills that really make a difference in human interaction are the ones that almost naturally flow from a truly independent character. So, the place to begin building any relationship is inside us, inside our circle of influence — our own character. As we become independent, proactive, centred in correct principles, value-driven and able to organize and execute around the priorities in our life with integrity, we can choose to become interdependent — capable of building rich, enduring, highly productive relationships with other people. (347 words)

~~Man~~ One may try to develop social relationships with his human relation skills, but it might compromise his true character. Triumph in social interactions requires triumph on one oneself first. Viable relationship can be ^{built} only by self command and control. Besides, self-control is necessary for self-respect. Human should enter in relations with others when he is truly independent. Otherwise, it would be self-destructive. Relationships are built on what one truly is. If one builds relationship ~~on~~ ^{through} ~~his~~ ^{one's} personality skills instead through ~~his~~ ^{one's} true character, it may smack of hypocrisy to people. Resultantly, it may not sustain more. Impactful relationships are developed only through one's true character. Hence, the place to develop viable relationships is lay in one oneself.

117 out of 347 words.

Idea is ok. Mistakes identified.

- Key role of one's character in one's relationships
- Necessity of self-discipline for sustainable inter-dependence.