The first argument is about

Globalization is riddled with numerous contestations. The first debate is about its definition. Some scholars define it in terms of deterritorialization while others advance its social interconnectedness as main aspect. Yet others argue its economic aspect as its main facet, whereas a few also assert that social cultural globalization is the defining feature of the concept. The second contestation, and perhaps the most important one, is about the far reaching impacts of globalization. Is it a force for good or force for evil? There is abundant literature arguing that it is a blessing. They advocate that globalization has reduced poverty, contracted inequality, spread democratization and peace along with numerous other advantages. At the same time, there is no inadequacy of literature on the topic, countering the good side of globalization and underscoring its harms. This literature propounds the idea that globalization is an other form of unfettered capitalism that makes richer richer and poor poorer. Not only in its definition and impacts but also in its evolution and causation the topic is debated. In summary, the globalization has been a controversial topic concept.
