

Various figures proclaim the superiority of one race over another leading to civilizational differences in history. Racial groups - comprising Aryans and Nordics - are mistakenly believed to be founders of a superior culture on the basis of their purer blood. Their historical conquest and rule over other peoples are described as an evidence for this belief. However, a study of history reveals the true picture: civilizations flourish due to geographical, political and economic factors - instead of racial differences. To end this civilizational antipathy, education - in the broader sense - needs to be imparted. It will enable humans to see the contribution of each group in the march of civilization, despite difference in their racial make up.