Evolution of the Middle Class

During the 19th century, the middle class was not considered a part of mainstream society. Men in professions were even not given importance and family connections determined the standing of man in a society. They were neglected by the people of mainstream society. Middle class was aware of its worth and built its own society. Their numbers as well as influence increased. They were critical of the aristocratic life and worried about the condition of poor. They gave more importance to the values of society that can guide the poor. They were respectable and their opinions varied.
