

Topic : Managing Child's Behaviour

The writer argues that modern educational theorists prefer to not interfere in children's activities. While if one gives time to children as one gives to its pets, will get best of their response. Instead of liking children on the basis of fulfilling social objectives, getting pleasure at children's presence without any other motive. Some teachers have this quality but it is impossible for those who are overburdened. Here author also argues that one's educational profession should not be utmost two hours a day. As children creates frustration while acting indisciplinarily, teachers made theories to treat them. However, the required understanding cannot be acquired with alienation only, unless the child feels that you like him as nothing is more effective than winning hearts with affection.
