

Precis-2004

According to the author, we try to enhance our social interactions with personality traits while ignoring the most important aspect that is character. Our character defines our relationships with others. To be oneself, one has to have command over one's every action and ensure self-restraint. ~~Our character~~ Without true independence and self-respect, one may build temporary human relations, but it won't last long. Our actual actions and words define who we are; therefore, fake sentiments will ultimately expose our real characters. To ensure productive social interactions, our deeds must reflect our actual characters ~~as~~ as character defines our real personality. Only by aligning ourselves with the core and widely acknowledged principles of moral decency, we can develop fruitful, and productive relationships with others.

Title:

Character: The Foundation of Social Relations

Total words: 351
Required: 116
Attempted: 120