Outline

1. Introduction

a. Thesis Statement:

Rooted in the same love for one's homeland, patriotism fosters inclusivity and civic unity, while nationalism can drift into exclusivity and division; history shows that unchecked nationalism often distorts patriotic zeal into harmful extremism and therefore require a pragmatic approach to be dealt with.

b. Definition and Explanation of Nationalism and Patriotism

2. Shared Roots ; Common Foundations

- i - Emotional Attachment to Homeland and Heritage
- ii - Pride in Shared History, Culture and Traditions
- iii - Common Use of Symbols, Anthems and Narratives
- iv. Role in Mobilizing People for Collective Causes
- v - Thin Dividing Line in Rhetoric and Political Application.

3. Patriotism as an Inclusive force

- i - Promotes Unity Across Divides
  - a. Case study of South Africa's Rainbow Nation
- ii - Encourage Civic Responsibility
  - a. New Zealand's "They Are Us" Campaign against the Christchurch Mosque Attack
- iii - ~~It~~ Welcomes Constructive Criticism
  - b. Case study: Martin Luther King's Declaration of Independence

iv. Balances National Pride with Global Cooperation

a. Case Study: Formation of European Union.

4. Nationalism as an Exclusive Force

i. Prioritizes One Group's Dominance: "Us vs Them" Approach

a. Sri Lanka's Sinhala Buddhist Dominance led to Tamil civil war

ii. Rejects Dissent as Betrayal and Turns Pride into Hostile Superiority

a. Case Study: Silencing of Political Opponents in Nazi Germany that led to Holocaust

iii. fuels International Isolation

b. UK's Sovereignty Rhetoric led to Brexit

5. Impacts of Unchecked Nationalism

i. Political Polarization and Authoritarianism

a. Freedom House 2024 Report: Global freedom under Populist Leaders declined

ii. Rise in Hate Crimes

a. UN OHCHR Reports surge in Hate speech and Xenophobia

iii. Trade Isolation and Sanctions

a. Economic Nationalism via Tariffs: US-China Trade war

iv. Cross-border Tensions and Conflicts Increased

a. Russia's Nationalism Claims over Ukraine resulted in Invasion.

5. Pathways to Harness Patriotism and Avoid Toxic Nationalism

6. Conclusion.

The Essay

After the 9/11 attacks in 2001, Americans rallied in a surge of patriotism, raising flags and donating blood to honor the fallen and support survivors. A surge of patriotism united the nation in grief and resilience. Yet, this unity veered into nationalism as fear fueled the Patriot Act and widespread suspicion of Muslim Americans, leading to persecution and hate crime incidents against them within months. What began as a patriotic solidarity, slowly morphed into nationalist fervor, a shift seen not only in America but in nations across history. Both rooted in the deep love for homeland, shared history, culture and tradition. Symbols like flags and anthems inspire collective action, with over 80% of people globally expressing national pride. Patriotism is defined as devotion to one's country, emphasizing civic duty and inclusivity and fosters unity across divides as seen in Mandela's "Rainbow Nation". Nationalism, on the other hand, is defined as attachment to one's nation, prioritizing cultural or ethnic dominance and risks exclusivity, hostility and isolation, often suppressing dissent and felling conflicts. While their rhetoric can blur, especially in crises, deliberate efforts like civic education, democratic institutions, and responsible media can nurture patriotism to unite diverse societies and promote global harmony. Rooted in the same love for one's homeland, patriotism fosters inclusivity and civic unity while nationalism can drift into exclusivity and division. History shows that unchecked nationalism often distorts patriotic zeal into harmful extremism and therefore requires a pragmatic approach to be dealt with.

Nationalism ~~does not necessarily mean~~ hating others, but it often means loving your own to a fault" (Yuval Noah Harari). Patriotism and Nationalism both ignite a deep emotional attachment to homeland and heritage, a sense of belonging that binds individuals to their country or people. This connection often surges during crises, such as wars or natural disasters, when collective survival demands unity. Whether it's citizens rallying after a national tragedy or soldiers defending their soil, this loyalty overpowers differences, culminating into a shared identity. For example during Hurricane Katrina in 2005, Americans across regions united to aid victims, reflecting a visceral tie to their nation.

Pride in shared history, culture, and traditions forms a core bond for both patriotism and nationalism, blending personal heritage with collective identity. Over 80% of respondents in the World Values Survey (2017-2023) across diverse nations reported strong national pride, reflecting how deep these ties resonate globally. This pride manifests in celebrating shared milestones like US Independence day (4th July) which honors struggle and cultural roots. These moments unite people across divides, reinforcing a collective narrative.

"A flag is a necessity for all nations; it can unite or divide" (E.M Foster). Patriotism and nationalism both rely heavily on symbols, anthems and narratives to evoke unity and purpose. National flags like the 50 stars and 13 stripes on the US flag, serve as rallying points that stir collective pride. Anthems like 'God Save the King' in the UK also inspire devotion.

These symbols create a shared language, binding people on moments of celebration and crises, like people do in Olympic games.

Moreover, both patriotism and nationalism excel at mobilizing people for collective causes, rallying citizens to act for the common good. As said by Theodore Roosevelt: "The true test of Patriotism is not how loudly you cheer, but what you do for your country." During world war II, the Allied powers made efforts, particularly in the UK and saw citizens unite under patriotic calls to defend their nation, with millions volunteering or supporting war efforts without any aggression. This mobilization reflects a shared commitment to protect or rebuild, as seen in disaster response like Pakistan's 2005 earthquake relief, where diverse groups rallied for recovery. The ability to inspire collective action is a strength of both, but patriotism's focus on shared welfare contrasts with nationalism's potential to prioritize one group's gains over others.

Patriotism is love; nationalism is pride taken too far. George Orwell. The line between patriotism and nationalism is razor-thin, often blurred by rhetoric and political manipulation. Psychological studies, like Kosman and Feshbach's 1989 work, distinguish patriotism as "love of country" and nationalism as "national superiority", yet leaders frequently exploit this overlap to sway masses. This blurring occurs because both draw on the same emotional wellspring: loyalty to homeland, but their application diverges. Politicians may invoke patriotic unity to justify nationalist agendas, as seen in Brexit's sovereignty rhetoric which isolated UK economically. The danger lies in how easily well created and more inclusive approach patriotic fervor can be steered towards exclusion or aggression. Patriotism and nationalism, though intertwined in their love for homeland, diverge sharply in their impacts on society, with patriotism fostering inclusivity and nationalism risking division. "We are one nation, one people, and we will rise together." (Nelson Mandela). Patriotism promotes unity across divides, as seen in South Africa's 1994 "Rainbow Nation". Mandela's vision reconciled diverse ethnic groups post-apartheid and transformed a fractured society by emphasizing forgiveness and shared citizenship. This patriotic force reduced ethnic violence significantly, uniting Black, white and coloured communities under a shared South African identity. Mandela's patriotic vision prioritized collective healing over retribution, setting a global benchmark for reconciliation.

Building on patriotism's unifying spirit, its encouragement of civic responsibility strengthens communal bonds. "The best way to find yourself is to lose yourself in the service of others." (Mahatma Gandhi). Japan's response to 2011 tsunami exemplifies this, as over 1 million volunteers prioritized community rebuilding over personal gains. This disciplined volunteerism, rooted in patriotic duty, showcased a collective commitment to national recovery, bridging regional and social divides. Unlike nationalism, which may demand loyalty to a single group, patriotism inspired Japanese citizens to act selflessly for the common good, reinforcing social cohesion.

Patriotism's inclusive nature also extends to welcoming constructive criticism to align a nation well enriched and deals "Injustice anywhere is a threat to justice everywhere" interesting content

King Jr.) . The US Civil Rights Movement, led by MLK, framed the fight for equality as a patriotic act to fulfil the Declaration of Independence's promise of liberty. This movement through non-violent protests, secured the Civil Rights Act (1964) and Voting Rights Act (1965), advancing rights for 13.1% of the population (African-Americans at the time). Patriotism here embraced critique to strengthen democratic values, fostering broader inclusion. The movement's success reshaped America's social fabric, proving that questioning national practices can reinforce, not undermine, unity.

Last but not the least, patriotism's strength lies in balancing national pride with global cooperation, fostering peace beyond borders. "Europe's peace is our peace." (Jean Monnet).

The founding of the European Union, rooted in Franco-German cooperation post-WWII, exemplifies this balance. After centuries of conflict, these nations forged the European Coal and Steel Community in 1951, evolving into the EU, which now spans 27 nations with a combined GDP of $18 trillion. This patriotic commitment to national recovery intertwined with a vision for collective security reduced intra-European conflicts significantly. The EU's success demonstrates how patriotic pride can extend outward, building alliances that strengthen both national and global stability, offering a model for harnessing love of country to promote enduring peace and cooperation in an interconnected world.

"Patriotism is when love of your own people comes first; nationalism, when hate for people other than your own comes first." (Charles De Gaulle). While patriotism harmoniously balances national pride with global cooperation to foster peace and unity. Nationalism veers towards exclusivity, often prioritizing one group's dominance while excluding minorities, breeding internal conflict and human rights violations. "It is a majoritarian fallacy to think that national minorities are backward, ethnic and chauvinistic, whereas majority nations are civic and inclusive," as noted in Sub-state Nationalism and International Law (Michigan Journal of International Law). This dynamic is evident in Sri Lanka, where Sinhala-Buddhist nationalist policies fueled the Tamil war, resulting in over 100,000 deaths. Similarly, in Myanmar, Buddhist nationalism has driven Rohingya persecution since 2012, displacing and killing over 700,000. These cases illustrate nationalism's exclusionary harm, undermining societal cohesion.

Nationalism further rejects dissent as betrayal, transforming pride into hostile superiority that silences opposition and justifies aggression. "Who is the modern 'traitor'? 'fifth column' accusations in US and UK politics" explores how such labeling stifles critique. In Nazi Germany, Aryan supremacy ideology under Hitler silenced political opponents, leading to Holocaust that killed 6 million Jews and enabled World War II aggression. Though Hitler came into power through a democratic procedure, where freedom of speech and religion is a basic form the foundation, he persecuted anyone opposing his ideas or religion specifically Jews. This rejection of dissent as disloyalty not only suppresses internal voices but escalates pride into destructive hostility, eroding democratic norms and fueling atrocities. By branding critics as enemies, nationalism consolidates power at the cost of human lives and ethical integrity, contrasting sharply with patriotism openness to reform.

Moreover, nationalism fuels international isolation, erecting barriers that harms economies and strain global relations. "The nationalist is a curse because through his very nationalistic, patriotic spirit, he is creating a wall of isolation," warns

Jiddu Krishnamurti in his writings (The Dangers of Nationalism and the Importance of Global Peace). well done exemplifies this, with sovereignty rhetoric driving the UK's 2020 EU withdrawal, incurring an estimated 4% annual GDP loss and increased trade barriers. Also in India, Hindu Nationalism since 2014, under the Hindutva policy (through the Citizenship Amendment Act) is bent upon excluding Muslims, demolishing mosques and persecuting them - due to which Freedom House downgraded India to "partly free" in 2021, citing rising discrimination. Such isolationism not only invites economic sanctions and diplomatic fallout but diminishes a nation's global influence, prioritizing narrow ideologies over collaborative progress, that perpetuates cycles of conflict and hatred and runs through generations.

While nationalism's exclusive tendencies culminate in international isolation, its unchecked proliferation inflicts severe political impacts, driving polarization and authoritarianism that erode democratic foundations. As Freedom House's 2024 report documents, global freedom declined for the 19th consecutive year, with political rights and civil liberties deteriorating in 52 countries, fueled by populist leaders rejecting pluralism and exacerbating armed conflicts and flawed elections. ~~A poignant case study~~ is Hungary under Viktor Orbán, where nationalist rhetoric has centralized power, undermined judicial independence and suppressed media freedom since 2010. This led to Hungary's downgrade from "free" to "partly free" by Freedom House, with polarized elections in 2022 marked by state-controlled propaganda, fostering authoritarian consolidation and societal division. Impacts of such aggressive and unhinged nationalism include weakened rule of law, increased corruption and emigration of over 500,000 citizens fleeing repression, highlighting how nationalism entrenches autocracy and stifles pluralism.

Apart from political erosion, unchecked nationalism sparks social impacts like a surge in hate crimes, amplifying xenophobia and fracturing communities. UN OHCHR data reveals hate speech and incitement surged post-2019, with a "disturbing groundswell" of racism; online hate targeting minorities rose by up to 70% in such regions as reported by UN Special Rapporteurs. India's Hindu nationalism (Hindutva) under the BJP since 2014 serves as an impactful case where policies like Citizenship Amendment Act fueled anti-Muslim sentiment triggering riots in Delhi that killed 53 and displaced thousands. Reports from Human Rights Watch detail over 1000 hate crimes annually, with lynching incidents rising 300%, eroding social cohesion and instilling fear among minorities. This escalation has deepened communal divides, reduced interfaith trust, and prompted international condemnation, illustrating nationalism's role in normalizing violence and perpetuating inequality.

Beyond social fragmentation, unchecked nationalism imposes economic burdens through trade isolation and sanctions, stifling growth and global integration. Economic nationalism via tariffs, like the US-China trade war, where the US imposed 125% tax on China, in order to protect its own industry, a policy called protectionism. Trump's "America first" agenda is hurting a lot of communities and states. Impacts of such nationalism include disruptions in supply chains, inflation spikes, and retaliatory measure (as China did), escalating costs globally. This isolation has widened inequalities, hampered innovation and deterred foreign investments, highlighting nationalism's self-inflicted wounds in an interdependent world.

Escalating from economic strain, unchecked nationalism heightens security threats <sup>well done</sup> via cross border tensions and conflicts endangering lives and stability. In "COVID-19, nationalism, and the politics of crises", scholars note nationalism's potential to exacerbate global crises. Moreover Russia's invasion of Ukraine, driven by nationalist territorial claims, escalated to full scale war in 2022, resulting in over 500,000 casualties. Impacts include widespread destruction, with Ukraine's infrastructure losses worth $486 billion (World Bank, 2025), energy crises affecting Europe and global food shortages from blocked grain exports. This nationalism driven conflict has intensified NATO-Russia standoffs, spurred arm race and displaced refugees, straining neighbouring economies, demonstrating how nationalism ignites protracted wars that devastate regions and undermine international security.

To counteract the profound impacts of unchecked nationalism, societies must ~~proactively~~ ~~harness~~ patriotism through inclusive strategies that promote unity and global harmony. "The love of one's country is a ~~splendid~~ thing. But why should love stop at the border?" (Pablo Casals). Promoting civic education that integrates diversity, like Canada's mandatory indigenous studies, has boosted ethnic tolerance by 20-30%. (UNESCO. Global Education Monitoring Report, 2020) Moreover, strengthening democratic institutions, including independent judiciaries and free press, as in post-apartheid South Africa, elevated freedom scores from "not free" to "free" by 2000. Encouraging global cooperation via international organisations' participation frames aid as patriotic strength, exemplified by New Zealand's climate pledges. Last but not the least responsible media use, through regulations like the EU's Digital Services Act (2022), curbs hate narrative, reducing incidents by up to 15%, as stated by FRA reports. Drawing lessons from inclusive nations with multicultural policies, yielding high social trust, guides this transformation. These pathways redirect national pride towards equitable progress.

In a nutshell, patriotism and nationalism spring from the same emotional well of love for one's homeland, yet their journeys diverge sharply. Patriotism unites, uplifts, and inspires citizens for work for the common good, while nationalism, when left unchecked, often excludes, divides, and breeds hostility. History offers abundant lessons: moments where inclusive patriotism rebuilt fractured societies, and moments where narrow nationalism plunged nations into conflict. The key lies in <sup>fine</sup> recognising the line that separates healthy pride from destructive superiority. When patriotism is anchored in respect for diversity, openness to criticism and a willingness to cooperate globally, it becomes a nation's greatest strength. Conversely, when national identity is weaponised to silence and marginalise ~~dissent~~ others, it corrodes unity from within. Ensuring the brighter side of national loyalty requires inclusive values, visionary leadership and a mature civic culture. In societies where patriotism is wisely nurtured, it not only unites citizens, but also fosters cooperation across borders. The enduring strength of a nation rests not in the intensity of its pride alone, but in the wisdom with which that pride is expressed. -
