

Precis: 2019

Dealing with Children

The author says that modern educationists give too much value to not interfering with children, but they ignore the joy of being with them. If one truly likes children, they accept guidance willingly. But if interest is based on future expectations, children will not cooperate. The right attitude is to enjoy their company naturally, without hidden motives. The author adds that overworked teachers ~~lose~~ this natural liking. Long hours with children bring fatigue and irritation. Teaching should not be treated as a full-time profession. This is because only affection, not strict rules, makes children accept guidance happily.

(total word count: 98)

well done

good work

main idea is picked and discussed

over all content is fine

rewrite underlined sentence

9/20