

Precis 2017

In Praise of Idleness

The writer argues in this passage that all the evils in this world are not brought about by the laziness of people but by misguided energies. The virtues of idleness are erroneously unrecognized and value of action is underrated. Throughout history, people who were actively involved in doing something have caused more harm to this world than those who did nothing at all. For instance, during the early twentieth century, if people had not spent their energies in fuelling conflicts and wars, the world would have so much peace now. Many of the tragedies would have been averted if those people had chosen to do nothing or otherwise had kindness and a little steady thought in their vision. Even today, the dimension of efforts being put in by people and organizations is inherently wrong, making it impossible to bring any improvements in the situation.

Idea and structure are generally ok. Spelling errors found.

Total Word: 434
Precis Count: 145