Title: The Modern Day Organization and Its Objectives

The paramount objective of an organization is to fulfill the wants of people. In the same way, for a researcher, his foremost objective is to determine growing demands of people to make policies. Therefore, effective objectives give an organization the value which people give it back, thus, organization sustains. In Pre-industrial era, people owned small enterprises single-handedly and made their objectives by their own desires. In Post-industrial era, division of management functions led to multiple objectives. These objectives were achieved by mutual coordination of multiple divisions in an organization. This way, organizational efficiency was achieved which benefitted the all who participated.
