If then a practical end must be assigned to a university course, I say it is that of training good members of a society. It is the art of social life and its end is fitness for the world. It neither confines its views to particular professions, on the one hand, nor creates heroes or inspires genius on the other. Works indeed of genius fall under no art; heroic minds come under no rule. University is not a birthplace of poets or of immortal authors, of founders of schools, leaders of colonies, or conquerors of nations. It does not promise a generation of Aristotles or Newtons, of Napoleons or Washingtons, of Raphaels or Shakespeares though such miracles of nature it has before now contained within its precincts. Nor is it content, on the other hand, with forming the critic or the experimentalist, the economist or the engineer, though such too it includes within its scope. But university training is the great ordinary means to a great ordinary end; it aims at raising the intellectual tone of society, at cultivating the public mind, at purifying the national taste, at supplying true principles to popular aspirations. It is the education which gives a man a clear, conscious view of his own opinions and judgments, a truth in developing them, an eloquence in expressing them and a force in urging them. It teaches him to see things as they are, to go right to the point, to disentangle a skein of thought, to detect what is sophistical and to discard what is irrelevant. It prepares him to fill any post with credit and to master any subject with facility.

Title: University Practical Training; Students Development

In universities, practical training is essential for making students ~~essential~~ beneficial for society. Universities do not produce great <sup>U</sup>philosophers, scientists, novel writers, <sup>warriors</sup>warriers and educationists in the market. But training makes students intellectually strong, intelligent and also fosters their thirst to achieve their goals. Similarly, education enables a man to analyse his views, to make choices and also produces morality in a man. Education teaches students what is wrong or right. Last but not least, education also prepares a man to serve at any position and to gain knowledge of any field.
