

Failure of Democracy in the Pakistan

One cannot deny the fact that democracy is a powerful ^{political system} element in which people have authority to live their life freely and openly. It provides freedom of speech where public have right to make accountable to their leader. ^{has been} Similarly, Pakistan is a democratic country since the inception. However, democracy in the country is often compromised due to internal and external factors, leaving the country in the state of social, political, and economic crisis. There are various internal factors which are core reasons behind the failure of democracy in the country, such as continuous military interference in the politics, unwanted dismissal of politicians, and abject nepotism in the governance. These factors undermined the democracy in the country because military, politicians, and bureaucrats ~~are~~ ^{are} preferring their own interests over public well-being. Apart from internal issues, external factors also played vital role in ^{undermining} ~~negotiating~~ rights of people, for instance; non-state actors who contributed in sectarian violence where many people lost their lives. As democracy ensures life, the country has failed to protect people's lives from non-state actors. Thus, it is logically safe to assume that Pakistan has badly failed to provide democracy owing to internal and external elements.
