

The Greek's Perception of Nature

The early Greeks perceived the nature differently, their artist; therefore, did not portray the beauty of their country's rich nature. Ancient people considers the external nature as a barrier in human progress. The Greeks even consider it a threat to them, specially in disasters. They also do not like it because they think that the huge number of mountains and forests slow down their progress, ~~and~~ specially land for cultivation. Therefore, their ancient art lacks any picture of nature, which they reject. In those days, they need a revolutionist for change. Also their republic state, was a home to small towns having no idea of metropolitan life. But, after the Alexander's day their perception for nature become positive and their love for nature is witness by different artist in their art.

words in passage app=394

words in Précis = 130