War Shapes Civilizations: Effects and Solutions

War is a reason of the breakdown of some civilizations because it has been possible to scrutinize the nature of breakdowns and occurrence of civilizations. War is not intolerable until it has negative impacts on its addicts that they have not potential to protect themselves from its harm. In early civilized nations, the destruction and cost of wars were too much. But, in modern days, it is easy for states to indulge in wars with some advantageous results. War does not start to show its malvolence until the society has begun to enhance its economic power. God of war, whom people trusted, devours shares of man's industry and intelligence. When society is capable to use its energy and resources for military use, then war manifests itself like cancer that proves fatal to its victims. Serious efforts have been made to free from war to save society. Salvation cannot be a source to limit war, but humans can do it as a private and states' citizens. A personal denial to go to war is dangerous to belligerent entity. In comparison, alternative peace strategy to counter-aggression to war may seem cowardly action. The writer agrees that second decision is more hopeful.
