

First Attempt

The contemplation of our lives shows us that, our activities and emotions are the result of living in human society. The resemblance of our nature with social animals is evident because we are fed and clothed by the efforts of others. Most of our knowledge without which we would have more or less like animals, has been given to us through language which was created by others. Therefore, our principal knowledge is the result of living in a community. The significance of an individual is because; he is a member of society which shapes him mentally and spiritually. If he is left alone he would become a beast.

Second Attempt

If we look at our lives we see that our activities and emotions are the result of living in human society. Our sociable nature is evident because we are fed and clothed by the efforts of others. Most of our knowledge has been given to us through language which was created by others and without which we would have more or less like animals. Therefore, our principal knowledge is the result of living in a community. Society shapes an individual mentally and spiritually due to which he becomes significant otherwise he would become a beast.
