Renewable energy has a credited role in mitigating the environment impacts, but it is not a full-fledge solver for saving the planet. The process of shifting towards renewable energy production is accured with extensive minning of rare earth metals, lithium ions batteries production for E-vehicles and burning of fossil fuels for wind-turbines projects. Ultimately, ^{shifting towards} renewable energy production is accompanied with waste production and multiple kinds of pollutions. Therefore; Although it has a role in environmental ~~mitigation~~ protection to some extent, limitations relating to shifting trends should be addressed.

Electric vehicles (E-vehicles) are ^{portraying} environmental friendly image but the production process produces pollution. The extensive minning for the rare earth metals like lithium, cobalt and nickel are practiced for lithiumion batteries' production. This mining results in soil-contamination, habitat-destruction, high water usage that contributes in environmental stress. Moreover, electricity production from fossil fuels for battery charging and battery disposal without improper recycling results in addition of toxic wastes in atmosphere and environment. So, E-vehicles are environmental friendly to some extent.

The disposal of renewable energy systems like solar panels and wind turbines after their lifespans is a complex process that requires practice and resources. Without a proper infrastructure of disposal of materials or waste, toxic waste start accumulating in environment. Hence, the green promise of renewable energy is ended.

(4)

The article suggests that renewable energy is not entirely pollution free during its operational phase because of reliance on fossil fuels in solar and wind power projects along with battery storage. Batteries are functional on metals like ~~lithium~~ lithium and cobalt and their extraction from their ores is not only causing environmental degradation but also abusing the human rights.

(5)

The article proposes that addressing the limitations of renewable energy is a complex process that needs to be addressed with utmost care and strategies should be most realistic to combat the problem.
