Outlines

1- Introduction:

"Is delayed marriage a sign of modern empowerment, or an emerging social crisis hidden career goals and personal freedom?"

Across the globe, the average age of marriage has steadily increased, with more individuals - especially in urban centers - choosing to delay this traditionally pivotal life milestone. This shift reflects deeper transformation in societal values, where personal aspirations, educational attainment, and economic independence are prioritized over early family life.

In Pakistan, the trend is particularly noticeable among the middle and upper-middle classes, where economic uncertainty, rising inflation and prolonged education contribute to the delay.

Additionally changing gender, increasing divorce rates, and exposure to Western ideals have reshaped perceptions about marriage. While some view this delay as a sign of maturity.

The consequences can be far-reaching.

It can lead to psychological stress, social isolation, and growing disconnect between generations. Communities rooted in tradition often find themselves struggling to reconcile these changes with cultural expectations.
