The Essay

In today's fast-paced and highly competitive world, "settling down early is no longer the priority it once was", as more people pursue personal growth, education and career goals before considering marriage. The shift has given rise to a growing global trend: Delayed Marriages. Unlike previous generations, where early marriage was a social norm and often a necessity, many individuals now choose to postpone marriage well into their thirties. This delay reflects deeper changes in society, including evolving gender roles, changing priorities and a redefinition of success and stability. The growing trend of delayed marriages in contemporary society stems from a combination of factors, including rising educational aspirations, economic uncertainty, shifting cultural values, and changing perceptions of personal readiness.

While postponing marriage often results in benefits such as emotional maturity, career advancements and more stable partnerships, it also brings notable challenges, including reduced fertility, mental health concerns, and the weakening of traditional
