common men think that the laws of the country and the freedom of an individual are in sharp contrast with each other. Apparently, this does not seem wrong. Every law imposes the restriction on the citizen. The more the laws in the country, the more are the collective restrictions. Excessive restrictions curb the individual's freedom. Conversely, limited restrictions broaden the individual's freedom base.

- To know about the hidden faults, it is necessary to know what our enemies say about us. Our friends often praise us to keep our hearts. Our faults do not appear to them likewise or they just hide them only not to hurt us. Or they turn away their eyes from them. Conversely, our enemy probes us thoroughly and makes concerted efforts to find a fault, though he exaggerates our small mistakes into bigger ones. But, some reality exists in there. A friend always exaggerates one's good deeds and an enemy focuses on the weaknesses. So we should be more grateful to our economy as he tells us about our fault lines. Seeing in this context, the enemy proves more beneficial than a friend.
