

Essay:

Frailty is no more the name of women

1- Introduction

Thesis statement: Women is an important class of the society who still faces many problems which require fundamental reforms to ensure the viability of women.

2- Historical Background of women's conditions:

- 2.1) Lack of fundamental human rights
- 2.2) Women as socially excluded class and legally at disadvantage in the society

3- Women in the contemporary world:

- 3.1) Protection of women's fundamental human rights under state and international laws

3.2) Political representation of women

3.3) Women's role in the nation building process

3.4) Women's role in the development of the world

3.5) Women driving business and innovation

3.6) Women in literature and film making

4- Challenges to women empowerment:

4.1) Violation of women rights

4.2) Religious biases against women's development

4.3) Socially discrimination against women empowerment

5- Wayforward towards women empowerment:

5.1) Empowering women through education

5.2) Ensuring women's political representation for their

empowerment
5.3) Removing social and religious discrimination against women
empowerment

6 Conclusion:

Greta Thunberg, a Swedish climate rights activist, sailed twice to Gaza leading human rights activists and aid against the Israeli oppression on the strip. She is the emblem of contemporary women. However, women did not have the privilege of such empowering representation. They were a less cherished class of the society deprived of the fundamental human rights. Women were socially a marginalised section of the society, who were also at a disadvantage legally.

On the contrary, modern day women are in a much better situation than the previous ones. Today, women are legally protected and politically represented. They are part of the nation building process and have a significant role in the development of the world. Moreover, contemporary women are key business holders and have an important contribution in literature and film making. Yet, despite these developments, women still faces many challenges. The world is witnessing continuous violation of women's rights. Their development is hindered by religious and social biases, which is detrimental to women's freedom. There is a significant need of reforms to address these challenges to women. For that, women should essentially be educated and politically represented. Additionally, the religious and social biases should be removed through effective social drive and narrative formation in favour of women. Moreover, is an important class of society who still faces many problems which require fundamental reforms to ensure the viability of women.