Title: The Importance of Teacher-child Relationships in Modern Education

Modern educational theorists overemphasize non-interference with children and neglect the positive aspect of enjoying their company. A genuine, spontaneous liking for children, similar to that for pets, fosters a positive response and acceptance of guidance without resentment. This desirable interest is not driven by ulterior motives like political or nationalistic goals.

Overworked teachers struggle to maintain this instinctive liking, leading to fatigue and irritation. Therefore, education should not be a full-time profession but rather a part-time role for individuals who can maintain a fresh and friendly attitude. True friendliness, not just self-control, is key. When a child feels liked, impulse often leads to the right decision, and rules become unnecessary. Affection and tact are the most effective substitutes for rigid rules.
