One's attitude defines one's situation.

The various psychological causes of unhappiness hold something in common. Being deprived of normal satisfaction in young age, the unhappy person focuses on outcomes while neglecting associated activities. Hence, to achieve complacency, he strives for temporary pleasure through oblivion. Ergo, he needs to be persuaded that happiness is feasible. Although a few people will opt for unhappiness if they get apprised of ways of achieving happiness, they are not enormous in counting. Concurrently, prudent people do not find a reason to live for in the world because they are believed to be experienced. They consider their pride in unhappiness a pragmatic attitude for an enlightened man. However, other people are suspicious of their pride. They believe that those who enjoy being miserable are not miserable.
